

A Note from the Editor

After a brief publication hiatus, I am pleased to reintroduce the Waterloo Historical Review for 2021. Historically, the journal has focused on the talents of undergraduate students from the University of Waterloo; this year, the author pool was expanded to include both graduate and undergraduate works from a variety of Canadian academic institutions.

The past year has not been without its challenges – a fact that all involved in the publication process can attest to – but the finished product has been well worth the wait. To echo previous editors of the Review, I hope you continue to pursue opportunities to research and write history. The range in subject and style, both from our selected authors and all those who submitted works, demonstrates a continued interest in understanding the past and its presentation and does credit to its students and teachers alike.

My thanks go to our team of student and staff editors, the support of the DRAGEN Lab at St. Jerome's University, as well as its members and our authors; there could be no Review without you.
