

About the Authors

Jessica Carter is currently in the third year of her Honours Arts program at the University of Waterloo. She is majoring in History with a minor in English. Her historical interests are in Medieval and Ancient history. Some interesting facts about her are that she enjoys reading comic books (DC all the way), prefers eating chocolate cake over vanilla, and is in the midst of publishing her first children's book.

Brittany Dreyer is a third-year student in the Honours Arts and Business program with a major in History at the University of Waterloo. In regards to her historical interests, she is particularly interested in international relations among countries following the Second World War and throughout the Cold War period.

Sarah Empey is in the final year of her Bachelor of Arts degree in Honours History and an Applied History Specialization at the University of Waterloo. Her research focuses on food history in colonial Canada, Canadian rationing during the Second World War, and noble diet in Early Modern Europe. After graduation she hopes to bring her love of history to her career.

Joyce Hung is a third-year Arts and Business student majoring in Legal Studies and enrolled in the Honours and Co-Op program at the University of Waterloo. As the 2014 recipient of the Chalmers Family Arts and Culture Experience Award and current President of C.L.A.U.S.E. Undergraduate Mock Trials Canada, Joyce has committed her passion and interest to the field of arts. She particularly enjoys European history and Canadian law, and free-lances as a graphic designer and artist for non-profit organizations and schools during her spare time.

Hannah Johnson is in the final year of an Honours History and French minor Bachelor of Arts at the University of Waterloo. Her interests in history include French history from the Revolution onwards, and post-colonial history, specifically in India. She has recently spent two years studying and living in France and is very passionate about the French language. She has also travelled extensively throughout Europe and many other parts of the world and she hopes to continue to be able to travel beginning with teaching English in Korea. She plans to continue her studies towards a Masters in Library and Information Science.

Kristopher Kinsinger is a fourth-year history student in the Arts and Business program at the University of Waterloo. Much of his research during his undergraduate degree has focused on the history of Canadian politics and the relationship between partisanship and foreign policy in Canada. During his free time he enjoys dabbling in landscape photography and reading at his favourite local coffee roaster. He is currently set to graduate this spring and plans to start attending law school in the fall.

Alexander Maavara is a third-year Honours History student at the University of Waterloo with a focus on Canadian and European twentieth century political and military histories. His primary interest of study is the First World War and the social, political, and ideological changes that were brought on due to it. Since June 2014, he has worked as a Research Assistant at the Laurier Centre for Military Strategic Disarmament Studies, working alongside Canadian military historians Terry Copp and Dr. Mark Humphries. This experience has given Alexander an appreciation for military history and the study of early twentieth century history.

Katelyn McGirr is a fourth-year Arts student majoring in Honours History with a Fine Arts Studio minor. As a Volunteer Editor for the Waterloo Historical Review, and as a current Co-President of the University of Waterloo History Society, she enjoys many topics in history, including Medieval Europe, Nazi Germany, religion and sexuality, and women's history. After three summers of working on the HMCS Ojibwa and at Annandale National Historic Site, Katelyn plans to study museology after graduation.

Sonya Pihura is a fourth-year Biology student with a minor in History at the University of Waterloo. She is especially interested in Medieval and environmental histories.

Colin Wintle is a fourth-year Joint Honours History and Political Science student with an International Relations Specialization at the University of Waterloo. His academic interests are mainly focused around social movements in the twentieth century with an emphasis on post-colonialism and the post-colonial relations of states. His most memorable course was Public History with Dr. Susan Roy, where he focused on craft beer as a social movement.
